

Five Things Happy People Do

They Find Their Most Golden Self.

Picture happiness. What do you see? A peaceful soul sitting in a field of daisies appreciating the moment? That kind of passive, pleasure-oriented, hedonic contentment is definitely a component of overall happiness. But researchers now believe that eudaimonic well-being may be more important. Cobbled from the Greek eu ("good") and daimon ("spirit" or "deity"), eudaimonia means striving toward excellence based on one's unique talents and potential. Aristotle considered it to be the noblest goal in life. In his time, the Greeks believed that each child was blessed at birth with a personal daimon embodying the highest possible expression of his or her nature. One way they envisioned the daimon was as a golden figurine that would be revealed by cracking away an outer layer of cheap pottery (the person's baser exterior). The effort to know and realize one's most golden self - "personal growth", in today's lingo - is now the central concept of eudaimonia, which has also come to include continually taking on new challenges and fulfilling one's sense of purpose in life. The positive emotion accompanying thoughts that are directed toward meaningful goals is one of the most enduring components of well-being. Eudaimonia is also good for the body. Women who scored high on psychological tests for it (they were purposefully engaged in life, pursued self-development) weighed less, slept better, and had few stress hormones and markers for heart disease than others.

They Design Their Lives To Bring In Joy.

It may seem obvious, but people do not devote enough time to thinking seriously about how they spend their life and how much of it they actually enjoy. Analyzing one's life isn't necessarily easy and may require questioning long-held assumptions. For example, a high-powered career might, in fact, turn out to be unfulfilling. Fortunately, changes don't have to be big ones to tip the joy in your favour. If you transfer even one hour of your day from an activity you hate (such as commuting or cleaning the bathroom) to one you like (reading, spending time with friends), you should see a significant improvement in your overall happiness. Taking action is key. Another recent study, at the University of Missouri, compared college students who made intentional changes (joining a club, upgrading their study habits) with others who passively experienced positive turns in their circumstances (receiving a scholarship, being relieved of a bad roommate). All the students were happier in the short term, but only the group who made deliberate changes stayed that way.

They Avoid “If Only” Fantasies.

If only I get a better job...find a partner...lose the weight...life will be perfect. Happy people do not buy into this kind of thinking. The latest research shows that we are surprisingly poor at predicting what will make us happy. People also tend to misjudge their contentment when zeroing in on a single aspect of their life - it's called the focusing illusion. In one study, single subjects were asked, “How happy are you with your life in general?” and “How many dates did you have last month?” When the dating question was asked first, their romantic life weighted more heavily into how they rated their overall happiness than when the questions were reversed. The other argument against “if only” fantasies has to do with “hedonic adaptation” - the brain's natural dimming effect, which guarantees that a new house won't generate the same pleasure a year after its purchase and the thrill of having a new partner will ebb as you get used to being part of a couple. Happy people are wise to this, which is why they keep their lives full of novelty, even if its just trying a new activity (diving, yoga) or putting a new spin on an old favourite (kundalini instead of vinyasa).

They Put Best Friends First.

It's no surprise that social engagement is one of the more important contributors to happiness. What's news is that the nature of the relationship counts. Compared with dashing around chatting with acquaintances, you get more joy from spending longer periods of time with a close friend, according to recent research. And the best-friend benefit doesn't necessarily come from delving into heavy discussions. One of the most essential pleasures of close friendship is simple companionship, “just hanging out” and hitting the mall or going to the movies together and eating popcorn.

They Allow Themselves To Be Happy.

As much as we all think we want it, many of us are convinced, deep down, that it is wrong to be happy (or too happy). Whether the belief comes from religion, culture, or the family you were raised in, it usually leaves you feeling guilty if you are having fun. Some people would say you shouldn't strive for personal happiness until you have taken care of everyone in the world who is starving or doesn't have adequate medical care. The Dalai Lama believes you should pursue both simultaneously. For one thing, there is clear research showing that happy people tend to be more open to helping others. They also make better spouses and parents. In one famous study, nuns whose autobiographies expressed positive emotions (such as gratitude and optimism) lived seven to ten-and-a-half years longer than other nuns. So, for anyone who is desirous of creating more happiness in his/her life, there are definitely proven ways that you can do it!

Material adapted by Suzanne Welstead from resources (mainly Gabrielle Leblanc) located within Counselling Services at the University of Guelph (2008).